Overview

Nursing 435: Professional Practice in Mental Health Promotion This 16-week paced online course provides opportunities to integrate theory and develop further skills related to mental health promotion with a focus on individuals, families and groups experiencing mental health alterations. Consideration will be given to mental health promotion with vulnerable aggregates and recognition of psychiatric mental health disorders that emerge across the lifespan. Opportunities to apply nursing assessment skills, such as mental status examination, and nursing intervention strategies such as therapeutic communication will be facilitated. A current snapshot of the field of psychiatric nursing, including both current practice and future research possibilities will be presented. A major focus of the course is a mental health promotion project. Nursing 435 is a six-credit course.

NURS 435 provides you with practice opportunities using a variety of online tools and experiential activities. Some of these practice opportunities will use video conferencing. Video conferencing allows course participants (students and instructors) to see and hear one another using a computer equipped with a speaker/microphone and camera. Unit 1 includes a learning activity that guides you through set-up and use of the selected video conferencing platform utilized. This activity also provides you with an opportunity to use video conferencing to meet your instructor and classmates “face to face” in real-time.

There are several times during this course when you will be required to participate in mandatory real-time video conference learning activities. The exact dates and times for these mandatory real-time experiential learning activities will be set at the beginning of the course with the course instructor. Participation in these mandatory real-time experiential learning activities is a graded element of the course. A pass in the mandatory real-time experiential learning activities is required to pass NURS 435.
